war. As all young men will do, many of them fell in love, which ended sooner than they thought in a marriage ceremony and a home.

Yesterday as they stood in line on the dock the eyes of more than one filled with tears as he looked into those of his wife or quietly smothered the hair of a little child at the weeping woman's side. Would their eyes ever meet again in this world? Would the time again come when the little one, smiling and chattering there while the parents were overwhilmned with grief, would once more nestle on his bosom and tell off the daily disappointments and then grow happy in relating its joys? Well, only Heaven knows.

At noon, with the rippling waters of the bay and the Roads fashing back the light of a splendid day, with the sounds of cheerful music floating on the breaze that swept in from the faintly murmuring sea, with handkerchiefs and banners waving them a sad but proud farewell and with fervent prayers for their safety and their speedy return rising to Heaven from aching hearts, they sailed away.

At Norfolk the battery took the Sesboard Air Line for Tampa, from which city it will be transferred to Cuba. If all goes well the men may soon return. If not, it may be many a day before they again see their homes.

Sad Scenes at Old Point Comfort Yesterday.

THE FAREWELL MEETING

Saynots Everywhere, Meeting of th mine Resigns, Robbine the Dead.

More than one weary, sorrow-stricken woman at Old Point and Phoebus last night vainly importuned tired nature's sweet restorer for her tender caress. The goddess, forgetful of their woe, kindly kissed their little ones, however, into peaceful rest, and thus made the long hours that lay between the darkness and the dawn seem easier to bear. The parting which they kindly kissed their little ones, the darkness and the dawn seem easier to bear. The parting which they kindly kissed their little ones, the darkness and the dawn seem easier to bear. The parting which they kindly kissed their little ones, the darkness and the dawn seem easier to bear. The parting which they kindly which they kindly which they kindly which they when love made life seem brighter than the love made life seem brighter than the value of the sweet memory of early days, when love made life seem brighter than the love made life seem brighter than the swelling that the lound of the sunlight that fell upon their sorrow at noontide, returned to touch their hearts as it had never done before and open the fountain of tears.

But why such sadness? Any of the two or three hundred people who stood on the pier at Old Point at high noon yesterday and saw the members of a Battery H. Fourth Artillery, marching to the music of the garrison band to the steamer which lay alongside the dock, can easily explain the cause of it. Scores of the men told the story as they glanced now and then toward a woman and bright-faced child in the throng. They were men going to war, but in which they had hoped to pass the coming years in peace with those to whose hearts their hearts are bound in which they had hoped to pass the coming years in peace with those to whose hearts their hearts are bound in a strong covenant of love, and with this thught came the still more painful fellows. The painful fellows will be coming years in peace with those to whose hearts their hearts are bound in which they had hoped to pass the coming years in peace with those to whose hearts their hea

HIS OWN SHADOW.

My friend Charles Daly is a member of the theatrical profession. In the early portion of his career, while yet unknown to fame, he found the summer lapsing by without having secured an engagement. It was not until late in October that he to was not until late in October that he received an offer to fill a vecancy that had occurred in a St. Louis theater.

As the position he was about to fill was a subordinate one, he was obliged to seek theap lodgings. A chance acquaintance on the train recommended him to an obscure bottal on a best store.

the trail recommended min to an observe hotel on a back street. Wearled with his long journey from New York—for there were no sleeping cars in those days—he begged to be shown immediately to his room. As there was no gas in the hotel, a sleepy beliboy lighted a diminutive candle and escorted him to his chamber.

Just as they commenced the ascent of the second flight of stairs they were startled by the most horrid laughter, apparently from some one in a room on the corridor they were approaching.
The servant hastened to explain that it was a gentleman who had been drinking too much and was suffering with delirium tremens.

My fright hesitated about approaching

My friend hesitated about proceeding farther, but on the assurance of the servant that this was the first time that the sick man had made any noise and that he was in charge of two friends who had volunteered to sit up with him Charley concluded to proceed.

The wind was howling mournfully around the house, and the rain beat wildly on the window panes. Hustily disrobing himself and extinguishing the candle, he enjoyed the luxury of the first stretch in 48 hours.

He fell asleen almost instantia. My friend hesitated about proceeding

8 hours. He fell asleep almost instantly. How week.

BRIEF ITEMS.

Robert Curtis, son of Sheriff Curtis, will leave in a few days for Tampa, Fla., where he will work at his trade. He is a shipjoiner, and has been employed at the Newport News yard for some time. Two of the Sheriff's sons will go south with the Guards.

Jack Routten, of Fox Hill, is evidently "skeered of Spaniards." He announces that he is having a belt of armor placed around his carryali and a coat of mail made for his horse preparatory to making a safe trip to the mountains. The armament of the carryall will consist of six muskets, divided equally between the port and starboard sides of the vehicle.

He foll asleep almost instantly. How long he remained so he could not tell, but some time during the night he was awakened by a quick, sharp noise at his bedside resembling the overthrow of a pieco of furniture or the bursting open of a door. Starting up in his bed, he was horrifled to see standing near him a figure in white, with glaring eyes and disheveled hair, apparently about to spring upon him. He at once realized the situation. The victim of mania-a-potu had escaped from his watchers and obtained admission to his room. Almost as suddenly, however, the apparation vanished.

The disappearance affected him no less seriously, for he knew not from what quarter to expect an attack.

Anything was preferable to such uncertainty, and momentarily expecting to encounter the maniac he groped his way in the dark to the table where he had left his candle.

There was often age of the rest of the room, and there was often age of that was empty.

Could be have been mistage, ships, have been a dream?

At all events, there was no more sleep

After dressing him At all events, there was no more sleep for him that night. After dressing him self he was about to go to the office of the hotel and apply for another room, when it occurred to him that it would be rather embarrassing to explain his reason for cemanding a change, and in the hope that it was near morning, for he had no watch, he wrapped the bedelothes around him and sat in a chair awaiting the break of day.

he wrapped the bedelothes around him and sat in a chair awaiting the break of day.

The candle burned to its socket long before day dawned. Its first feeble glimmer had hardly mady its appearance when he descended to the office and waited his breakfast, with the determination of seeking other quarters afterward.

He had decided to say nothing of his scare, but when the clerk, surprised at his carly appearance, inquired if he had not rested comfortably he determined to confide in him, with the hope of obtaining an explanation of the mystery.

The clerk evidently believed that it was nothing but a dream, but he sent to inquire if the sick man had left his room during the night. He received the positive assurance of both the watchers that he had rested very quietly and that such a thing was impossible, as neither of them had closed his eyes.

In the hope of setting his mind at rest the clerk suggested that he should sit near the deor of the breakfest room and inspect the faces of the guests to identify if possible the intruder. Finally he turned to his body-ser-vant and ordered the boy to bring from the cellar a bottle of his finest the door of the breakfast room and inspect the faces of the guests to identify if possible the intruder.

The arrangement was carried out, and after the last guest had breakfasted my friend was forced to believe that none of them could have been the intruder, but the impression yet remained that he could not have been deceived.

The clerk determined to go up stairs and make an examination of the room.

This was done in the presence of my friend, who accompanied him without discovering any possible means of exit.

Vexed and annoyed with himself for having invited by his confession the fill concealed amusement of the clerk, he sat upon the edge of the bed, endeavoring to recall all the circumstances of the case.

While in this position he slowly raised his head, when his eyes encountered what seemed to be the apparition that had previously presented itself. A second glance reddened his cheeks with shame when he recognized himself in a mirror.

With this clew to guide him he discovered that the noise which had awakened him was made by the porter of the hotel, who overturned a chair in an attempt to extinguish a lamp which was burning in the corridor. Starting in surprise from a heavy sleep, my friend beheld, by the brief light of the lamp which shone through the transom of the door, his own reflection in the glass, which disappeared, of course, when the light was extinguished.

This is the veractous history of a man who was frightened by his own shadow.—

How He Shot.

A Texas military company was out on the range recently practicing at rifle shooting. The lieutenant in command suddenly became exasperated at the poor shooting and, soizing a gun from one of the privates, cried sharply:

"I'll show you fellows how to shoot!"
Taking a long aim, and a strong aim, and an aim altogether, he fired and missed. Coolly turning to the private who owned the gun, he said:

"That's the way you shoot."
He again loaded the weapon and missed. Turning to the second man in the ranks, he remarked:

"That's the way you should not a dozen this way he missed about a dozen times, flustrating to each soldier his personal incapacity, and finally he seedentally hit the target.

"And that," he ejeculated, handing the gun back to the private, "is the way I shoot."—Los Augeles Express.
